You are in Hell because whatever your neighbour has, you want for yourself. You only love to hold the things that are dear to others, and why would they deserve them anyway? You punish the world's materialists by coveting their possessions for yourself.

When you visit a house, you will ask questions with regard to its ability to store stuff. You want to take all precious items from Hell's residents, and what places one has to put stolen silverware and magazines is an important factor.

At some point, you will covet the house that another Recently deceased appears to like a lot. You will become obsessed with this house, and do everything in your power to suck up to Hell's realtor and get a better place in line. Just to see the look on their face.

When you get irritated with another Recently deceased, obsessively pull petty pranks on them, even after it's no longer funny. This will only happen once: Choose your target and doggedly pursue this individual to the bitter, bitter end.

At the Estate auction, you are most likely to trade anything you've got for the house someone else wants. Anything they're willing to trade, you can one-up. You don't even want to touch your "ideal" house, whatever that is.
